THE WRITTIER ANNIVERSARY.

To day marks the hundredth aniverary of the birth of one of America's greatest poets, John Greenless Whittier, and the event has been fittingly remembered, particularly in Massachusetts, where personal remembers of the poet linger lovingly. Whittier has been linened to Robert Burns, and there are points of similarity of life and literary effort. Both came from bomes of humbs people. Buth gained their finest school-ing from that heat of all teachers, ex-perience; and in consequence the writ-ings of each glow with that touch of kindly tatavest which comes from close essectation with the everyday matters of ordinary life. What Burns was to the Scottish nation-the poet of the peole-so was Whittler to the people the United States. As depicters of real life, they stand apart. Like Burns, country' When the newspapers that Whittier's popularity grows with the are criticising the voyage of the Atlantic years, and the contennal of his birth, steet stop to consider this side of the celebrated to-day, is widely observed case, they no doubt will admit that sewherever homely virtues reign.

WHERE SECRECY HAS A RIGHT. While there is a great deal of interest but it has to do with a naval manocurre of more than ordinary importance, and so great a naval fleet as set out from being such, deserves a bit of protection Hampton Roads yesterday, ostensibly for the Pacific coast, and while naturally the newspapers would like to know the whys and wherefores of the orders, it looks quite like the previshness of defeat back of some of the things written in consdemnation of the proceeding. Defeat that the newspapers have been feat, in that the newspapers have been buffled in their search for the actual purpose of the fleet and its ultimate destination. And they are now giving vent to ders. Some of the criticism may repregent the apprehension that arises from uncertainty; and we'll admit that there Byronic.

She looked at me coldly, In silence at first; A threatening silence Implying some villence: Not that which falls goldly, But calm at its worst— Was the way she looked coldly, In silonce at first.

She looked at me coldly,
And chill was her tone;
And though I sought gravely To meet the gaze bravely, To give it back boldly, I couldn't, I own— While she eyed me so coldly, With ice in her tone.

She looked at me coldly, As cold nature must; The sudden she muttered, Next spinttered, then uttered (As folks have of oldly); "The steampipes has bust!"
And she looked at me coldly, As cold laties must.
